Dear Editors,

I am submitting for your consideration an article entitled How Much Do Statutes Disagree? Measuring Definitional Fragmentation Across a Legal System.

The article addresses a question that the drafting literature has long discussed through examples and never measured: how far a legal system actually achieves consistency in the terms its statutes define. It does so for Saudi Arabia, using a machine-readable corpus of 290 legislative instruments in which every definitions article has been parsed into term–definition pairs — 1,920 distinct terms carrying 3,318 definitions.

Its argument is deliberately deflationary. Measured automatically, 61.5 per cent of the substantive terms that more than one instrument defines are worded divergently, and a study reporting that figure would look like a finding of pervasive incoherence. The article argues that it is not one, and that two separations are needed before any such number means anything: one between definitions that name a particular instrument or organ of state — which cannot conflict with each other — and definitions that describe a class; and one between divergence in wording and divergence in law. Reading the twelve most widely shared terms across every instrument that defines them leaves four genuine conflicts. The clearest is the one in the title: a sole trader with no employees is an establishment under the Competition Law and is not one under the Labour Law.

I hope it is of interest to the Journal of Legislation on three grounds, and the second is the reason I am sending it to a journal of legislation rather than to a general law review. It brings quantitative evidence to a question the drafting literature has had to argue from anecdote. It concerns a jurisdiction with no general interpretation statute — which makes it the untreated case against which the Commonwealth interpretation acts can be assessed, and the article sets out which of its four conflicts such an instrument would and would not resolve. And it ends where a legislature can act: three responses of ascending ambition, the least of which requires no legislation at all, and a finite list of terms rather than a rate.

The manuscript is approximately 8,043 words including footnotes, and its citations follow The Bluebook. In keeping with law review practice it is under simultaneous consideration elsewhere, and I will notify you immediately of any offer. A curriculum vitae accompanies this letter. Several companion manuscripts drawing on the same corpus are under review at other journals — among them one describing the corpus as a research resource and one analysing its citation network — and none overlaps with this article's contribution. The corpus, the analysis code that reproduces every number and figure in the article, and the checks that refuse to build a manuscript carrying a hand-typed figure are all public in an openly licensed repository, which the article cites.

Yours faithfully,
